The human experience is shaped by sensory perception or bodily response to stimuli. We engage with our surroundings and those who inhabit it not only by way of some combination of taste, touch, sound, smell, and/or sight, but by the emotional, psychological, and physical response that sensory feedback provokes. The annual OSU Classics Graduate Colloquium invited papers for a virtual conference on a range of topics that explore the ways in which ancient peoples understood and were affected—in body, mind, and spirit—by sense perception and bodily or emotional response.
